

Charlie wanted to be smart his whole life. When Miss Kinnian told him that there might be a way to make him smarter, he decided that he was going to take it. He wanted to be able to read and write like other people. He wanted to have normal conversations with normal people. Getting the chance, he decided to take it, even though Miss Kinnian told him that it probably wouldn't be permanent. Charlie made the right choice even though it was a big risk. The surgery gave him the chance to experience life as he had never seen it before. The risk of having the surgery fail was worth the reward of a new experience.

Charlie never had a true friend until the operation, when he met Algernon. While Charlie was at work, he thought he had friends because they invited him to parties and for drinks. But what he soon learned was that they just invited him to make fun of him. Before the operation he always raced Algernon and was jealous of him. He would always wonder how Algernon could beat him. After the operation, when he raced Algernon, he was happy because he would beat him. Charlie loved to hold Algernon and watch him. When Algernon started acting strange, Charlie admittedly wanted to know what was happening and why. Once he found out what was happening, he did not feel bad just because he would soon be going through the same thing, he felt bad because he would be losing his friend. Once Algernon died, Charlie was devastated because he knew that he had just lost his best friend in the world. Due to the operation, Charlie got a true friend.

After the operation it took a while, but Charlie started writing and reading better. At first he was very frustrated because it wasn't coming to him "fast" enough. But once he started getting smarter it was like he couldn't stop. He was spelling better than he ever had. Since he knew how to spell, it made it easier for him to read. He loved to read all the time. Since he was reading more, his vocabulary was growing bigger. He also learned many languages. As he got smarter, he was able to find out what was happening to Algernon and why. He was able to write down everything that was happening.

Furthermore, Charlie finally got to live his dream. Charlie wanted to be like other people and, thanks to the operation, he became like other people. He was able to read all the books people talked about. As well, he was able to have a conversation with someone and understand what they were saying. He was able to understand everything and explore more of the world than he had ever known about. He didn't care that he was losing it all, he was just happy that he was able to live his dream.

Charlie always wanted to be smart. When Charlie got the opportunity to get smarter he decided to take. He knew that he could die but he still decided to risk it. Knowing that anything could happen, he still took it. Knowing everything, he still took the chance of a lifetime and it was worth it for him.
